Covid-19 has had a severe impact on the internationalization of higher education. While remote learning is a good tool, it is not entirely an attractive substitute for the experience of studying abroad. Recent surveys of prospective international students reveal that they are not in favor of remote learning because, a) They miss out on an International experience, and b) It limits their entry into foreign job markets and networking. Even with the reinvention of learning environments through digitalization, it does not replace real-time student-teacher and student-student relationships.

This is a golden period to establish strong partnerships and explore new markets such as the Pacific where Covid-19 has had a dramatic impact on New Zealand's job market. There has been a sharp fall in the number of vacancies advertised online across all the regions, occupations, skill levels and in all industries in the June 2020 quarter. With such a drastic downfall in the job market, there is now a growing need to up-skill by gaining qualifications from more developed and larger economies like Canada who have a reputation for high-quality education degrees and qualifications recognized by employers and academics worldwide.

Our Target Market mix is from the Pacific Region mainly focusing on the following markets:

Domestic students from New Zealand and other Pacific nations who are keen to pursue all levels of education in Canada and in all types of institutions.

International students in New Zealand who have completed their study, currently on a post-study work visa and wanting to explore further study options for a better international career and future opportunities.

Research scholars from the domestic and the international student community who are seeking a wider scope and research opportunities in Canada.

Canada is one of the best countries in the world for quality of life and an outstanding quality of education. Famous for some of the lowest university tuition fees among English-speaking countries, Canada continues to be one of the world's leading destinations for international students.
